

URANUS OPPOSITION NATAL NORTH NODE

If transiting Uranus is in Opposition to the North Node in your chart, it is also Conjunction to the South Node. The Conjunction is more powerful than the Opposition.

While the North Node has similarities in its energies to Jupiter, the South Node has similarities to Saturn.

While writing this article, transiting Uranus was currently entering into the sign of Gemini which suggests that if transiting Uranus is conjuncting your South Node, your South node is in Gemini and your North Node is in Sagittarius. Let's use Uranus in Gemini as our example in this post.

Uranus brings a change of direction, and these changes can at times be considerably challenging, especially when we are speaking of the South Node's interaction with it. There may be a general feeling that change is due although not wanted. It may be forced on you by opposing forces often linked to other people's influence in your life. You may be the subject of an unintentional change of direction and the beginning of a new start.

You may have felt quite comfortable with how things were, but we are not here to follow our South Nodes path (which is quite familiar). We are here to move towards our North Node objectives (which are new and unfamiliar). Changes may be unexpected and challenging, and these changes may take you in a direction you do not desire. As mentioned, they may be forced upon you.

If by chance this change has to do with relationship issues (7th house emphasis or potential 5th house especially if the relationship is new), perhaps there have been issues within the relationship, undenounced by you, for some time and these issues are now surfacing. Some things may seem to just come out of the proverbial woodwork, yet somehow feel destined, and you are forced to change directions or adapt to a new attitude.

If there are further implications stemming from the 12th house, for example, then perhaps things have been going on behind your back, or you may have pushed things under the rug, preferring not to face the matter at hand. This will affect you personally because your North Node is in the first house if your South Node is in the 7th house (again using our example mentioned earlier).

This connection with Uranus and the Nodes is a challenging one, and although things seem destined to take hold one way or the other, they are actually bringing you to where you need to be. Adapting may be challenging but you likely have little choice. You must move in this new direction as it is your life's path. It may take some time to unravel and there may be some difficulties ahead, especially if Uranus goes into retrograde and passes over the same area again. If it does go retrograde, it will take some time for things to settle as it will hit your North Node three times. The most challenging time is Uranus' first pass over the placement.

Transiting Uranus Opposition Natal North Node and Conjunct the South Node will bring about sudden changes likely brought on by others. Sometimes life must lead, and we must adapt to what it brings with it. Letting go and moving forward may not be easy, but things happen for a reason. This is part of your destiny!